The new snow means skis and sleds.

The warm lunches which are being enjoyed by the school will be in the hands of Chester Wheeler and Shurwin Bennett with the aid of Mrs. Head for this week.

The window decorations in both rooms are unique and interesting. The primary windows depict a mountain on whose sides the sports of the season are being enacted, while those in the grammar room show a high mountain on whose summit sits a castle with gilded towers.

Last Monday morning we found new blackboard borders awaiting us. These are even more lovely than the ones before. We all feel a deep debt of gratitude to Arthur Gilbert who does the lovely borders absolutely free hand.

COMMUNICATION

Having read the news item from Rowe Hill, Greenwood, last week, would say that I too have been much interested in the bird mentioned and find that the only one in my bird book that answers to that description is the "Starling," a European bird introduced into New York a few years ago.

It is quarrelsome, and master of the English Sparrow, and it is feared may drive that come to my kitchen window box for seed and seeds are the chickadees, nut-hatches, downy and hairy woodpeckers, tree sparrows, starlings, and bluejays. In the little maple tree back of the house I often see four or five bluejays at one time waiting for their turn at the seed hanging there.

GOULD-TROUNCES NORWAY IN DOUBLE HEADER

Varsity 64-20. Seconds 38-15.

Smarting from the two point defeat handed them by Mexico, Gould took vengeance on the humble Norway. With Alger, Chesebro, and Saunders dropping in baskets from any and all angles of the floor, the winners ran up a rather one sided score. These men with 27, 16, and 13 points respectively accounted for all but six of the winners' 64 points.

On the defense George Parsons played nice ball as did also Saunders. These men broke up play after play of the Norway team as they started down the floor. Kilgore was an outstanding man for Norway with five field goals for 10 points. The visitors were clever shots when they could get near enough to shoot but the Gould defense kept their shots few and far between.

The Academy team will travel to Rumford and Norway this week and to Bridgton next week after which they will be seen in Bethel for the whole month of February. There are some great games coming especially Mexico, Rumford, and Gorham Normal. The South Paris game should also be a good one.

Aunt Tilda's Advice

H. IRVING KING
(Copyright)

OLD BROWN had been plugging company with Matilda for two years now. They understood that they loved her and were ultimately to be through the formal question of the part and the formal as Matilda's had never been. The fact was that Reggie spoke because he had never, in two years, been in such a condition that he felt himself in speaking. To be in a girl whose parents had a fortune complicates matters. Men Matilda's fortune would be no complication at all, only to hasten the wedding. He was not of that sort. He expected that he would be able to give Matilda—as he—such a luxurious home as he had now enjoyed in the great aunt.

He had been "bred to the law" and never been able to establish in his profession. He was the world and making heavy of it in his attempts to reach a modest competence, as desperate. He thought of Matilda and telling her just what he stood, of saying to her: "Failure—and shall always be no use. I love you too well to share my broken fortune to cast myself as a burden on your wealth. You would despise me, and justly so."

Matilda knew how affairs stood. She would have rushed to drown herself and her wealth and her command him to and her. But she didn't know, therefore, she was pensive. Her mother to confide in the confidant. The old lady was to be made the confidant in affair.

"You dear child," cried the old woman, "delightful girl, Reggie—that's all. Make him jealous. That'll bring him to time. He's Percy Delightful. He's in love with me. I know he is. Pretend to love him—and let Reggie see it. Speak then."

"What would be right?" demanded Matilda. "To encourage the attentions of a man whom I did not want to marry?"

"All's fair in love and war," said the old woman. "What makes you think that Reggie is in love with me?" asked Matilda. "He has never shown any symptoms."

"I know," chuckled old lady. "You go ahead and do as you want your Reggie. I went away in deep thought. I did not approve of her aunt's plan then she did want Reggie. It so happened that Mr. Delightful was in love with Matilda at all. A man of forty-five, a widower, a prosperous lawyer who managed Tilda's business affairs for this capacity, and that of a friend, he was often at the home and had taken a fatherly interest in Matilda, whose girlish admirer and whose intelligent conversations he much enjoyed, was all. He was, therefore, surprised and not a little annoyed when he realized that Matilda was obviously "set" for him."

"I did very well, very well, indeed," said Aunt Tilda after the second embarrassing meeting. "We must get Reggie and Delightful together and you do as well as you can and we'll bring Reggie back in no time."

"I can't and won't go on," said Matilda. "What will Reggie think of me?" "Oh, Reggie will think all right," replied the old lady. "The next time Delightful called Aunt Tilda aside and told him the story, Reggie will play his little comedy."

"I said the lawyer, 'I fear I am not an actor to do as you request two days later Reggie came to Matilda, wearing his hat and coat. 'Hurrah. We can get Reggie, Matilda. I've got a job as manager for old Delightful at a salary—and if I make good, all he says he will take me as a partner later,'" asked Matilda. "I replied Reggie. 'I said Aunt Tilda that night before. I told you if you follow my advice Reggie would propose.'"

No Time Lost
Indianapolis business man, for rigorous diligence to his was asked how he found time to the movies with his wife every week.
"You see, it's this way: I find I take any more time to go to the whole story of the life of my wife returns," said Indian.

Back Home Where Cupid Reigned

By CORONA REMINGTON

"HELLO, Madge, supper ready? Your turn to check it, you know. Brought some lettuce and tomatoes so we could have salad."

Vivian Longmire dropped her packages on a nearby chair and, removing her hat, flung it on the bed.

"No, I was kept late at the office. Just got in and found a letter from Alice White and simply had to read it."

All this from Margaret Hollister as she continued scanning the pages in her hand.

"What's new back home?" asked Vivian, crossing the room and leaning over her friend's shoulder.

"Alice is going to be married. What's the matter with us anyway?" asked Madge. "We left that little sleepy hole of a place because we thought—"

"We thought we'd have a better chance of marrying well if we came to a big city."

"Well, we've been here three years and most of the evenings we've spent lolling around in our kimonos reading books from the free library. Exciting!"

"And even if we do write thrilling letters to the girls back home about how interesting our work is we'd give our heads to quit tomorrow. And yet we'd find country life even more unbearable now. I remember how Frank used to come over Sunday. He'd walk home from church with me and then he'd stay to dinner and afterward we'd walk some more. It was pretty weather and sometimes he'd stay to supper and on one or two occasions he'd go to bed. And all the time he was there he wouldn't say a single word unless it was something about the crops or the weather."

"Well, you'll have to admit, too, that Frank had a dreadful case of you and that makes some men sort of awkward and speechless. Everybody thought it was going to be a match."

"I guess it would have been if we hadn't come out here. Wonder what they're doing at home now," sighed Vivian.

"Cleaning up the supper dishes and getting ready to go out for a ride."

"It makes me sort of homesick to think about it. I can just hear the lazy tink of the cow bells as they browse around for a last dewy mouthful before lying down."

"Hush, Vivian, do. This is unhealthy. Let's go to supper together."

"I don't want any supper. I'm homesick—downright homesick and I want to go back," Vivian persisted.

"So do I."

So it was arranged. Their fathers met them at the station and took them home in a wheezy, muddy car.

"Land, but it's good to have you back," Mrs. Longmire said as Vivian jumped out of their little touring car and fell into her mother's arms. "Don't seem like I could ever let you go again. I told Frank you was coming today and he'll be over after supper. I'll have to go and see about the supper now. Come to the kitchen, Viv, soon's you get your things off."

Mrs. Longmire, energetic and more than contented, hurried into the kitchen. The fresh country food seemed so good to Vivian's craving, homesick palate and she was happy for the first time in ages. Afterward she and her mother cleaned up together in the middle of the job Frank appeared.

"They told me out front I'd find you back here, so I just came on in," he explained.

"Hello, Frank," she smiled. "It's good to see you again. Here's a cloth; you can dry these dishes while I wash 'em."

Once at work his embarrassment left him.

"Viv, you got to marry me this time, honey?" he asked girlishly, taking her hand. As she made no effort to withdraw it he drew a little ladder and slipped an arm around her shoulder. "I built us a little house on the edge of your place 'cause I knew you'd come back to me some day; and now's a good time for us to start getting settled 'cause harvest is done."

Harvest? What made her ears and not long ago she had so hated the word.

"You better," said Frank, "cause you won't have any little partner to go back with you. Madge's going to marry some kid. He's got them a little house built, too."

"Oh, you're kidding," she laughed.

"No, honey. She promised him six months ago I saw the letter."

"The little fool! She never told me."

"Well, I don't care about her. What are you going to do about me?" he asked impatiently.

"Why, I'm going to say 'yes,' please," she answered demurely. "And I'm going to tell that you have to get away from folks and things to get a right perspective sometimes and to learn how to appreciate them."

Vision of Eyes
The greater part of the head of a fly is occupied by the eyes, some recent thousand in number, described as compound. Between the compound eyes and near the top of the head is a triangular arrangement of three simple eyes. The upper two are much farther apart in the female than in the male. In spite of the arrangement of the eyes and the great mobility of the head it is not believed that the vision of flies is especially acute, although the range of vision is wide.

Ethel Had Her Hair Cut

LILLIAN M. MITCHELL
(Copyright)

EL FIELD had beautiful hair. Beautiful? Why, it was magnificent. And in this workaday world of bobbed or shoulder-length curls, it was a thing of beauty. Ethel's hair stood out against the group of girls of her age as one apart. Couldn't marry a girl who was fairly enough to snip off her hair a—man. Jim Ford had said.

ups this was Ethel's reason for her hair long. Those great, copper-lustered curls took an hour to make each morning. In the evening, if she planned to go out anywhere or to a special company (like Jim she patiently sat before her mirror hour with her arms crossed, her head, eyes anxiously on the clock, while she waited for the hair to dry. It was long enough to reach her shoulders.

one day in late August Mrs. Field was called away from home. She had the taxi drawn away and she told Ethel that he was away on a business trip for a week.

felt bleak and lonesome when she was away from the telephone. But you to remember, Ethel, that you marry and go away. Some that the first time you feel out of sorts the thing you want is a crack good meal and a new pair of shoes. Because the day when you'll be glad of the advice is something I give, knowing it's never too late.

And Mrs. Field had told her this once, she had told her a hundred and twenty-seven times. Ethel traveled to the icebox. After a thick of chocolate cake that would be tolerated on the eighteen-day and two glasses of ice-cold milk, she felt a little less lonely. For a new hat!

The thought of trying to persuade a clerk to hunt out a smart hat with a double head-size was too far for Ethel.

night," she told herself softly, off just a little of that hair. "I wish to heavens I'd had it cut and never let it get long in the first place. But if I had it cut, mother would be just sick and tired."

bleak look again came into her eyes as she moved towards her own room. She cut it off just below the ears," she said.

only she found herself cutting. "Cutting hair wasn't as easy as she had supposed. It had to be cut square-ended in a line across the bottom. Goodness, she said."

"I'll never be able to get it again. I wonder if those funs will turn under?" she would not. Every time she went into place they sprang out. Her efforts impliedly, she'd just pin it up any old way and run down to the corner beauty parlor.

cut it off!" advised the girl. "What good will it do?" "What good mother likes it," Ethel replied.

She'll like you a lot better looking like everyone else. Instead of looking like a girl, she said. "Is the fellow to give you a tip?"

our later Ethel looked incredulous. "Why, she was—no doubt about it—she was!" She had never known that a girl was so beautifully shaped. The man and hurried home before her dressing case.

Why she didn't give a hang in thought about her or her hair was going to sit and look at her and run her fingers up and down her back as long as she could.

door bell announced a visitor. The girl found Jim's car in the apartment building. Now she had her hair!

get my clothes the other night. "Thank you, I'll stop and get 'em away out of town—hello!" the matter—with you—go you sure look swell with that hair! Say you ought to go into some of those beauty contests. Ethel—only I wouldn't want my wife in one!"

Ethel laughed. "Guess I'll do that," she said carelessly.

"Say, I could start any time tonight as well as now—what do you say if we chase down to Pencock's and pick out your ring?"

"My ring?" repeated Ethel, wondering why her heart was pounding "that way."

"Yes, your ring—your engagement ring," he said.

"Oh, my ring," said Ethel, trying to gain a moment. "Why, that will be fine," she said brightly. "I was going downtown to buy a hat anyhow."

Which all goes to prove that mother's advice is never, never to be disregarded!

China Awheel Now

The statement by Donald Skinner, advertising manager of the General Motors Corporation of Japan, that twice as many automobiles were sold in China during the first six months of 1929 as were ever sold in any entire year previously, may come as a surprise to many Americans in view of the revolution-torn and economically unhappy condition of that country. But, politics or no politics, the East has no more been able to resist the lure of the automobile than the West has, and China's economic development has been progressing despite all her ways, says the Detroit Free Press. The growth of the automobile trade has inevitably brought an improvement in the road system, and while the Chinese roads, judged by American standards, are still poor, they have been adequate enough to open large sections of the country. Of course, every new road means an extension of the productive activity of the land.

In Alaska, according to a dispatch, a great round-up will be staged, led by an airplane, to capture some incredible number of reindeer. Frankly, we do not care whether this drive succeeds or not, says the New York World. Something tells us that this round-up is associated with the recent campaign to make reindeer meat popular in New York; and if any meat is worse than reindeer meat we are at a loss to think what it is, unless it would be mule meat. The tenderest steak off a reindeer is tough, coarse and stringy. It is strong without being gamy. It is dark and horrible in appearance. Even the restaurants where it is served do not recommend it very highly, and suggest that you order a special dish, a sort of reindeer hamburger, wherein the meat is chopped up fine so you do not have to chew it, and so seasonally with onions that you cannot smell it. Reindeer meat is so bad that there ought to be a law against it.

To call a man a "mutton-head" is not to be guilty of disorderly conduct—such is the solemn decision of a New Jersey court. The man may be even an official, a police official at that, and still an irascible citizen may take this verbal pot shot at him without danger of fine or imprisonment, says the Boston Transcript. In this case, the plaintiff was a clerk of the police department of Bergenfield, N. J., and it took the Supreme court of the state to establish the precedent that even one of his Imperial associates might be regarded as a "mutton-head," from the civilian point of view, and still be unable to prove that he had been damaged. "Mutton-head," as defined by the dictionaries, the court held, "is a dull, heavy, uninteresting person, and the dignity of the clerk may have been ruffled by the language addressed to him, but that it was indecent or disorderly is not established."

To Have Later
You Must Do Without Now

It is perhaps necessary for many to do without some things now in order to have them later. ANTICIPATING the future is sensible and logical. Sometimes it requires financial courage to say: "I CAN'T AFFORD IT," thus having that courage brings its own reward.
